Casee	Burgason-Cruise
Rachel	Waldron	This bullying of an entire profession cannot be stopped by simply purchasing our beloved software. We are standing together and putting an end to this today and forever!
Melissa	Frederiksen	I jumped on board the Houzz bandwagon and was a staunch advocate until 2016. I started noticing a trend in the quality of my leads and a marked drop in leads in general in 2017. It was about this time that Houzz changed its algorithm and despite paying $3600 per year, the quality projects were not to be found. It is clear that my ROI is non-existent and footed the early cancellation penalty just to get out of my contract. I will do anything in my power to educate the consumer, designer, or vendor about some of the practices (not described here) and dissuade anyone from engaging with Houzz and its practices.

It must not be used by a company privy to that information to monetize or benefit in any way without a clear consent of the owner of the PII. Houzz must change its terms reflecting this rule. So no neuralnetworks (NN) often referred as AI (artificial intelligence) or Deep Learning training on our information without our consent.

Angela	Mabe
Courtney	Otte
Jennifer	Hyman	Houzz is no different than other sites like Angie's list, Home Advisor, etc., except they have pretty photos - placement on Houzz is not a guarantee of quality products or services. Buyer Be Very Aware!  Houzz exploits the photos placed on their site from home design professionals to sell products from their marketplace and services their service professionals for their profit. This puts them in direct competition with the home design professionals listed on their site, often at a great cost to that professional as Houzz tells Chicago-land designers we must spend $1500 a month for better placement.  While it's not illegal, it is a misuse of trust, and that just doesn't sit right with me.

I am strongly concerned that my participation in Houzz has begun to be used against me and my industry. Interior designer livelihood includes selling products. In my design firm, lighting, size, proportion, shape, form, scale and texture are carefully calculated and balanced against other elements in each room we design. In interior design, every element selected has ramifications and making a change without taking the whole room into consideration is detrimental to good design. Anyone can BUY things. Bridget	Edwards
Jennifer	Koch
Janna	Chanoux
Aaron	Duke	Houzz was never intended to benefit interior designers, promote the expertise of design professional, or put homeowners in contact with professionals in their areas to further promote the interior design industry and ensure homeowners were getting experienced, professional, and knowledgeable designers. Houzz is nothing more than a typical, social media, tech startup company that relies on it's members to make money. In two years, I spent over $25,000.00 dollars on advertising, videos, and "editorial" content. I can say to this day, I haven't recouped a single penny in my return on the investment that I pay. Houzz doesn't want to promote the design professional. In fact, I am pretty sure that anyone who wanted to create a profile and distinguish themselves an interior could do so to pad the pockets of the executives of Houzz. The types of homeowners this site attracts are bottom feeders. They have no intention of hiring a Design professional. They are just phishing for free ideas for their DIY projects. I am very aware that any marketing practicing can take 4-6 months for the end user to begin to receive any results. After 3 years on the site and no results... it is obvious this is not a site intended to promote the design industry but more of one to create corporate greed. The fact that they have taken our "to the trade only" vendors and put them online and accessible to the general public is a disgrace and further emphasizes the fact that they are there to make money, not help designers. I could go on and on, but it is a waste of breathe.

This last item is not going to happen in your retail marketplace or at any other retail store, but our industry is suppose to show cost to our clients. No other industry works that way. Then, when I asked for some of my images to be removed from my profile, i was told to "read the fine Print of my contract" Houzz didn't have to remove them because they OWN the image the moment it is uploaded. Becky	Shea	I don't use Houzz and never have for this exact reason. It seems like a worthless platform that preys on the weak.

Wanda	Suitt-Horton	Though images were shared, at the early invitation of Houzz, to inspire consumers about interior design, the end result it was done on the backs of those who brought in the creative collateral- the interior designers, the architects, stylists, etc. Without these images, Houzz and other similar companies, would have nothing to promote. Read the fine print. They have deemed it their terms can be changed at any given time, like Ivy, the company who sold to them their paying members' community. When a consumer goes to Google a local designer, Houzz is at the top, driving traffic to the Houzz site, creating the illusion of some sort of excellence. Sounds great for designers with Houzz listings, right? Wrong! Unless you make a pretty decent investment in their advertising, your listing may not even show up in your local market. Even paying designers in large markets have shared it hasn't produced results. They do this, along with attached product tags for an attempt to copy the designer's work/sources. (By the way, even though the photography may have been paid for by the designer, the legal rights go back to the photographer and with Houzz directing them to third party usage, it's unethical and illegal for them to do so. The designer can't eliminate their profile without appearing out-of-business and their images are still on the site, perpetually. It's much more complex than my single post here. And by the way, consumers' information is also subject to being offered to third parties. No protection of privacy. Again, read the fine print. They do not honor who brought them to the dance. They have left with another partner whose name is NOT Integrity.

Evelyn	Eshun	I recall being at a seminar when Houzz first started with the founder ... there was a question from the audience ..'will you ever charge for advertising in specific locations and will you ever use our images for advertising"..the answer was 'no'....fast forward... I have been currently continually asked by Houzz to sign up and pay for more coverage in order to have potential clients see my work and therefore connect with them...I have considered it, but my gut is not letting me ... perhaps the gut is right!!

Kathy	S	It's not right for Houzz to make money off designers work without compensation. I refuse to upload photos of my projects because Houzz can tag any item and sell it to their client base, and they also refuse to let designers watermark or remove images of their work. I invest a lot of time and money making sure my clients have Interiors that are unique to their needs and personalities. Houzz is effectively stealing intellectual property from designers and making a profit off of it. For those of us using IvyMark as a project management system, Houzz's purchase now ensures they have access to our customer info and project files. I wholeheartedly object to the use of our proprietary information to sell more product or attempting to market directly to our client base. Immediate steps must be taken to rectify and resolve intellectual property rights and compensation. If any IvyMark information is used without my permission, I will allow my membership to expire. If others do the same, it will make IvyMark yet another poor choice for Houzz.

Michelle	Mawby	Houzz started their business by using our photos pulled from our own websites that we paid to have taken. I am appalled and angered every time they call me asking me to pay for advertising. They built their business on free images from designers like me that they euphemistically call "Early Adopters" and continually make money from of our work and photos.
